Spastin is an AAA+ ATPase that is part of the microtubule-severing protein complex. Spastin is expressed in the uninjured spinal cord and is upregulated after axotomy. Although spastin is expressed in spinal axons in the uninjured spinal cord, its role in promoting axon regeneration after injury remains unclear. In the present study, we generated mice with a conditional deletion of spastin in astrocytes, termed spastin(cKO), by using a glial fibrillary acidic protein (GFAP) promoter. We have shown that astrocyte-specific deletion of spastin did not affect axon outgrowth or growth cone morphology in vitro. Furthermore, spastin(cKO) mice exhibited a slower rate of recovery from spinal cord injury than controls. The axons did not show aberrant morphology or presence of growth cones at the lesion site after axotomy. However, we observed a decrease in the length of regenerating axons in spastin(cKO) mice after spinal cord injury. Thus, our results indicate that astrocytic spastin is dispensable for axon outgrowth and elongation after axotomy and that it is also not required for axon regeneration in vivo. The relationship between self-efficacy and substance use behaviors in a national sample of the U.S. adolescent population. The present study explored the degree to which youths' substance use behaviors are associated with youth self-efficacy beliefs. Students (N = 34,790) from 23 U.S. school districts, 13 to 18 years old and enrolled in 2,387 public schools, were surveyed for self-report measures of alcohol, tobacco, and drug use and for self-efficacy beliefs. Girls had more severe alcohol and tobacco problems than boys, whereas boys had more severe drug problems than girls. Alcohol use was associated with girls' and boys' greater self-efficacy beliefs, and tobacco use was associated with boys' and girls' lower self-efficacy beliefs. Drug use was unrelated to self-efficacy in either gender. Explanatory models in which youths' self-efficacy beliefs predicted substance use were tested using a structural equation model, specifying self-efficacy beliefs as predicting substance use
