Tropical dry forest vegetation is well characterised in South America, but generally the particular patterns of flowering that are observed in dry forest plants have not been recognised. This is particularly the case for the "seasonally dry" forests of Borneo, where the patterns of flowering are not known, and in addition, flowering can be both annual and perennial. In order to address this problem, we present here a survey of flowering in over 450 vascular plants growing within a 7 x 5 km grid survey of the Kaindi area of Brunei Darussalam. The results indicate a strong association between flowering and successional stages of the forest: annuals increased in number between the mi-serang and adenanthos stages, and perennial herbs increased in number between the adenanthos and cyathaceae stage. There was also a marked increase in the number of flowering species between the mi-serang and adenanthos stages. The temporal and spatial variation in flowering in the dry forest was complex, suggesting there are at least two different states of flowering in which the same species may flower, one of which is restricted to the mi-serang stage, and a second which is not restricted to this. Increasing the operational lifetime of a printed circuit board (PCB) without the need to replace the board is an ongoing challenge, particularly in the field of telecommunication and networking applications
